The only difference between that and precisely-aimed fire is what degree of sight alignment—if any—they see. Close-range targets don't require perfect sight alignment for an accurate hit, and point shooting will increase speed. One technique that works for some is to ignore the sights entirely and shoot the

As long as you maintain that proper aim throughout the process of firing your handgun, your point of impact should be very close to your point of aim—and your targets should reflect that. If your rounds are scattered, the problem could be that you're focusing more on the target than the front sight.
